Public Art in the planning process in Oxfordshire

The district councils of Oxfordshire are working together to promote Public Art policies (often referred to as Percent for Art), as recommended by Arts Council England. The term Percent for Art was adopted by local authorities throughout the country to enhance new developments with works of art and high quality design.

Statues, fountains, murals, carvings and a myriad of decorative forms have been used in town centres, on public buildings and in the countryside to add beauty and character, for millennia. Local authorities continue this tradition, adopting policies to ensure that artists and local communities are involved in creating visual enhancements that will be valued and appreciated by residents and visitors.

Definition

The term 'public art' refers to commissioned works of art designed by artists and craftspeople for particular buildings or sites that are accessible to the public.

Public art is always site specific and can take many forms that may include traditional sculptures as well as integrated features such as benches, fencing, paving, seating, furniture, murals, windows, flooring, gateways and banners.

Work can be permanent or temporary, inside or outside a building, as an integral part of a building or free-standing in an open space. Materials and processes used to develop the piece can involve woodwork, stone carving, metal work, painting, glasswork, lighting, photography and textiles.

How the policy works

In accordance with each local authority's Local Plan, district councils will encourage developers to allocate a percentage of the development costs to the commissioning of public art.

This policy applies to both private and public sector developments, in particular those with publicly visible or accessible spaces, and larger scale developments.

Criteria for public art varies according to each local authority's policy. Planning officers and arts development officers can offer advice from the earliest stage in the planning process.
